1. Introduction

As long as a company exists, it invests in assets. In fact, a company invests in assets to continue to exist, and moreover, to grow. By investing to grow, a company is at the same time investing to maximize the owners' wealth. Maximizing wealth of a company's owners requires that its managers continually evaluate investment opportunities and determine which ones provide a return commensurate with their risk. Let's look at Company A, B, and C, each having identical assets and investment opportunities, but that:

- Company A's management does not take advantage of its investment opportunities and simply pays all of its earnings to its owners;
- Company B's management only makes those investments necessary to replace any deteriorating plant and equipment, paying out any left-over earnings to its owners; and
- Company C's management invests in all those opportunities that provide a return better than what the owners could have earned had they had the same amount of invested funds to invest themselves.

In the case of Company A, the owners' investment in the company is not what it could be as long as the company has investment opportunities that are better than those available to owners. By not even making investments to replace deteriorating plant and equipment, Company A will eventually shrink until it has no more assets.

In the case of Company B, its management is not taking advantage of all profitable investments -- investments that provide a higher return than the return required by its owners. This means that there are foregone opportunities and owners' wealth is not maximized.

But in the case of Company C, management is making all profitable investments, maximizing owners' wealth. Company C will continue to grow as long as there are profitable investment opportunities and its management takes advantage of them. And Company C represents most large corporations: continually making investments and growing over time.
