

THE TECHNOLOGY OF THE PRAETERNATURAL: AN EMPIRICALLY BASED MODEL OF TRANSPERSONAL EXPERIENCES *

Peter L. Nelson, Ph.D.

Nelson, P. L. (1990). The technology of the praeternatural: An empirically based model of transpersonal experiences. The Journal of Transpersonal Psychology, 22, 35-50.

INTRODUCTION

There have been a number of noteworthy attempts to create meaningful models of altered states of consciousness and their associated altered reality experiences (Clark, 1983; Fischer, 1972; Tart, 1975). Although these models have been somewhat helpful in our attempts to understand the nature and relationship of everyday experience to transpersonal states, they have had a number of important shortcomings. First, they have tended to use pictorial 'maps' of consciousness and/or experiential states without making a clear empirical link between diagrammatic representation and experiential fact and, second, these models have not been directly constructed from an empirical data base nor, conversely, have they been tested against empirical evidence. Other attempts have been made to overcome these deficiencies by operationalizing altered state experiences into clear-cut, discrete events and testing them against Tart's model in laboratory controlled settings (Pekala & Levine, 1981-82; Pekala & Wenger, 1983). However, this approach is of little value when we attempt to study transpersonal experiences as they actually happen to people in the 'real world'.

The question remains as to whether there is any way of studying spontaneous transpersonal cases without either 'reducing' them to what they are not, or leaving us to ponder individual occurrences in the absence of a theoretical framework capable of encompassing the whole. Of course, there are numerous religious or quasi-religious interpretations put forward in an attempt to make sense of transpersonal encounters. Some, like that of Wilber (1977), are excellent pieces of scholarship, but require adoption, in part, of a particular religious worldview. Our need, then, is to conceptualize transpersonal experiences in a manner which begins to approach ontological neutrality,¹ leaving interpretation to the individual reader.

This paper would like to suggest that this may be possible in the context of an ontologically neutral methodology. Such a methodology would attempt to recognize that ontological assumptions (such as the objective empirical reality of science or the divine of many religions) often force the direction of the research and thus pre-draw conclusions. In effect, neutrality requires that we suspend
