Abstract. The ways in which objects are referred to by using spatial language depend on many factors, including the spatial configuration and the discourse context. We present the results of a web experiment in which speakers were asked to either describe where a specified item was located in a picture containing several items, or which item was specified. Furthermore, conditions differed as to whether the first six configurations were specifically simple or specifically complex. Results show that speakers' spatial descriptions are more detailed if the question is where rather than which, mirroring the fact that contrasting the target item from the others in which tasks may not always require an equally detailed spatial description as in where tasks. Furthermore, speakers are influenced by the complexity of initial configurations in intricate ways: on the one hand, individual speakers tend to self-align with respect to their earlier linguistic strategies; however, also a contrast effect could be identified with respect to the usage of combined projective terms.

1 Introduction

The investigation of spatial language usage encompasses a broad range of interesting research areas, including object reference and resolution on the basis of spatial position, spatial cognitive processes, mappings of language and other representations with the real world, formalizations, psycholinguistic approaches, and discourse analytic perspectives. Our approach focuses on a simple 2D situation shown on a computer screen, containing only a small number of similar items of two types, circles and squares. Our interest lies in how people refer to one (previously specified) object in such a scene depending on the discourse context, focusing on two crucial aspects which may affect the level of specificity in speakers' descriptions: first, the linguistic representations may be influenced by the given discourse task, such as describing where an object is versus specifying which object is intended. Second, there may be an effect of the discourse history: if speakers start out with complex configurations and – accordingly – complex descriptions, do they stick to the same level of detail, or do they rather switch to simpler descriptions in subsequent utterances? We investigated spatial descriptions in a web experiment in which these two aspects were systematically varied.

Previous research of the usage of spatial language revealed many aspects that influence the choice of spatial terms with respect to a given situation. For instance, the
