4 I heard about a high school in Chicago where students had to pass a certain number of courses to 5 graduate, and if they didn't pass a course, they got the grade "Not Yet." And I thought that was fantastic,
6 because if you get a failing grade, you think, I'm nothing, I'm nowhere. But if you get the grade "Not Yet"
7 you understand that you're on a learning curve. It gives you a path into the future.

8 "Not Yet" also gave me insight into a critical event early in my career, a real turning point. I wanted to 9 see how children coped with challenge and difficulty, so I gave 10-year-olds problems that were slightly 10 too hard for them. Some of them reacted in a shockingly positive way. They said things like, "I love a 11 challenge," or, "You know, I was hoping this would be informative." They understood that their abilities 12 could be developed. They had what I call a growth mindset. But other students felt it was tragic,
13 catastrophic. From their more fixed mindset perspective, their intelligence had been up for judgment
14 and they failed. Instead of luxuriating in the power of yet, they were gripped in the tyranny of now.

15 So what do they do next? I'll tell you what they do next. In one study, they told us they would probably 16 cheat the next time instead of studying more if they failed a test. In another study, after a failure, they 17 looked for someone who did worse than they did so they could feel really good about themselves. And 18 in study after study, they have run from difficulty. Scientists measured the electrical activity from the 19 brains students confronted an error. On the left, you see the fixed mindset students. There's hardly any 20 activity. They run from the error. They don't engage with it. But on the right, you have the students with 21 the growth mindset, the idea that abilities can be developed. They engage deeply. Their brain is on fire 22 with yet. They engage deeply. They process the error. They learn from it and they correct it.

23 How are we raising our children? Are we raising them for now instead of yet? Are we raising kids who 24 are obsessed with getting A's? Are we raising kids who don't know how to dream big dreams? Their 25 biggest goal is getting the next A or the next test score? And are they carrying this need for constant 26 validation with them into their future lives? Maybe, because employers are coming to me and 27 saying, we have already raised a generation of young workers who can't get through the day without an 28 award.

29 So what can we do? How can we build that bridge to yet?

30 Here are some things we can do. First of all, we can praise wisely, not praising intelligence or talent. That 31 has failed. Don't do that anymore. But praising the process that kids engage in: their effort, their 32 strategies, their focus, their perseverance, their improvement. This process praise creates kids who are 33 hardy and resilient.

34 There are other ways to reward yet. We recently teamed up with game scientists from the University of 35 Washington to create a new online math game that rewarded yet. In this game, students were rewarded
36 for effort, strategy and progress. The usual math game rewards you for getting answers right right now, 37 but this game rewarded process. And we got more effort, more strategies, more engagement over 38 longer periods of time, and more perseverance when they hit really, really hard problems.
