

Strange Meeting Analysis

Adrian Barlow writes of Susan Hill's Strange Meeting: "At the time of its publication, to write a novel about intense relationships between men in the First World War was considered an ambitious risk for a woman writer." Compare and contrast the ways in which your three writers present relationships between men. 'One of the paradoxes of the War - one of the many - was that this most brutal of conflicts should set up a relationship between officers and men that was... domestic. Caring. As Layard would undoubtedly have said, maternal. - Pat Barker: Birdsong Susan Hill's Strange Meeting, published in 1971, Sebastian Faulks' Birdsong, published in 1993 and Siegfried Sassoon's poetry written during 'The Great War' are all set in World War One. A significant theme that all three texts have in common is the relationships between the soldiers and their development throughout the novel or poem. Strong relationships between men play a key part in any war literature and comradeship is an element of the First World War that is often dramatised or written about.

The government even used the idea of comradeship in their 'Pals Battalion' scheme, the plan being that men would fight harder if they fought with their friends. War fiction literature often focuses on the friendships between men at war, and the contrast of the relationships on the front line compared to those at home. The intensity of the relationships between the men is emphasised by the extraordinary circumstances they are placed in, which causes masses amounts of pressure.

Susan Hill's Strange Meeting deals with aspects of youth, experience, friendship and love. The representation of relationships between the men in the trenches is a key focus in this novel. Hill shows the positive impact of war upon the men's relationships through the friendship of the two central characters, John Hilliard and David Barton, who would not normally be friends if not in combat situation. Throughout the novel the men form a powerful relationship which becomes absolutely crucial for survival.

In comparison Birdsong, by Sebastian Faulks, shows the different relationships Stephen Wraysford, the protagonist of the novel, has with Michael Weir the commander of the miners and Jack Firebrace a soldier in Stephen's rank who he becomes close to. The strong comradeship between Stephen Wraysford and Michael Weir in Birdsong allows both men to form a bond that would not have been of the same nature had the men not been in a combat situation. The war causes them to understand each other well.

An example of this is when Stephen reads Weir's rune cards, "Weir likes it. It makes him think that somebody cares about him". Stephen understands Weir's thoughts and feelings and fixes the cards to desirable predictions, and in doing so Weir feels comforted with the harsh unpredictable surroundings of war "I want you to do the runes. Tell my fortune". Stephen undergoes most of the combat as a nihilist, detached from any sense of reason, "I don't value my life enough. I have no sense of the scale of these sacrifices. I don't know what anything is worth".

Both officers and men consider him cold, isolated and a little odd however his relationship with Weir, similar to Hilliard and Barton, teaches him on a personal level. The reader
